General Sherman says, however, we ought to have two hundred thousand Springfield muskets, so that if it should become necessary, as undoubtedly it would in case of war, to increase the army suddenly to over fifty thousand men, we would not be obliged to purchase arms from private manufacturing companies -the Winchester, Colt and Providence tool companies. The guns that would be obtained from such companies, although of the same caliber as government Springfields, yet owing to the difference of their ejectors, separate ammunition would have to be purchased for each kind, and the whole capacity of the companies named would have to be pushed to the utmost to equip from fifty to one hundred thousand men. It is this tendency to "crown Grant" which aroused the opposition of patriotic Republicans, and which will cause them to vote against the man who shows his willingness to wear a crown. It is understood that the supporters of Grant want a strong government. They desire to revolutionize the frame-work that was cemented by the blood of '76. They was cemented by the blood of '76. They yearn for a centralized one-man power that shall disc upon the prostrate republic. And so anxious are they for this radical change in the spirit and the substance of American institutions, that they have worked themselves with the control of the control of the results of the control of the results.
